Virtual Dj .NORMAN, OK - In spite of what you may have heard, Britain's homeopathic hospitals are not in any way more effective than those of other countries, and yet they are often favored and reimbursed by insurers (see our special report of 2010 and the New Yorker's feature of the same year). British patients are no less happy with their treatment than are patients anywhere else in the world, yet rates of cost-effective prescribing of homeopathy are higher in Britain than in countries as diverse as Saudi Arabia, Israel, and Australia. This is not about woo. It is not about health markets, for the NHS is considered to be very efficient by its own criteria, as well as being very social and equitable. It is about the British public's willingness to pay more for the sense of safety and security that comes from a well-functioning health service. So why are these misunderstandings perpetuated? For one, it's not always clear what exactly is covered by a given health service, and what it doesn't cover. Brits, for instance, tend to assume that drugs are covered in health spending, even though this is not always true. It is not always made clear that, in so-called innovative treatments, such as homeopathy, there is still no clear evidence of their clinical effectiveness. And a public that is as interested in health care policy as it is about welfare policy is vulnerable to a double whammy: the campaigns of those who wrongly believe that the NHS is a black hole for money, and the ignorance of the public (yes, homeopaths are ignorant of basic evidence on the effectiveness of homeopathy) about the cause of disease and the roots of health. So how to change the picture? The obvious first step
