This new update is the first to integrate the new cloud functionality previously announced at Max. Adobe says the cloud version is being beta tested, so the list of your projects is growing. This amounts to a beta list for any camera owner and shows you the last projects you created and how many iterations of those you made. You can manage the cloud version of a project, making it available for people to collaborate on. This enables you to share an edit with a team of people who can tag on it, or comment. You also can submit a version history for project uploads. That way, you can see exactly when a change happened, and who was involved. Lightroom also can receive submissions directly in Cloud Drive; the software sends a notification that it's been changed so you know that's where to find the version. Unlike Camera Raw, the cloud version of your project is always attached to a particular version of the image. I like this idea, since you can't make changes to a Cloud Document and then go back to making a change in the same place, or damage the result. You can continue to use the old way of working, but now you can just log on and include your Cloud Photographs and you will see your latest changes automatically. This way, you don't have to talk to your assistant about what's changed. Lightroom 5 features simple but significant improvement in its ability to parse all types of files contained in a folder and import them into the catalog. The files in the catalog can be still be tagged, you will still have the ability to edit your files, choose an alternate file by clicking or using the keyboard shortcut you prefer, and even to share them to another desktop version of the software. The difference is that images imported from videos now are displayed in perspective--when you click on video files they open in the correct presentation. Similarly, Live Photo libraries will show images in their original form.

The next step when starting in Photoshop is to create a new file. This file will be a duplicate of your current image so that you can manipulate it in the program and also change the current settings. To do this, you will want to choose File & command + N, this will open the file and create a duplicate of your current image. If you choose the New File option, this will also create a duplicate file. Next you will want to drag the new file into your palette to move the file. You want to setup the new file to be the same size as your original file. Now you would do all the adjustments that you want to make to the new file. Once you finish setting things to what you want to make sure you save the file with your new settings. There are a few things that you want to keep in mind when creating a new file. One is that working with layers is better than with raster images, so you may want to downsize the image while keeping your file intact so that you can work on different areas. As well, create your new file in PSD format to ensure that you have the best assets in the new file. The next step is to go to File & Edit > Adjustments > Adjustment Panel > Brightness/Contrast > Brightness. Here you will want to use the brightness control until you achieve the best results. You may or may not want to use the desaturation option to remove some of the color in the image. Again, it is all about adjusting lighting until you find a balance that you are most happy with. For best results, you won't want to use white as a preset. There's a handy white correction icon on the bottom tool bar. Once your image is set, go over it again, and adjust the blacks to remove any unwanted shadows on the image. e3d0a04c9c
